

The Stamm laboratory aims to understand the rules that govern alternative splice site selection and to understand how cellular signals change alternative splice site selection in human cells. The laboratory applies this knowledge to understand human diseases caused by missplicing events to pave the development of rationale therapies.

The group members strive to do excellent, original science by tackling these problems with all available experimental techniques and by continuously improving and expanding their knowledge about molecular biology.